Q: AngularJS $q.all inside a service I have a service like this: App.factory('BuyDatesService', ['$http', function($http){ var promise = $q.all([$http.get("/MyController/GetDates?Country=GB"), $http.get("/MyController/GetDates?Country=FR")]) return { GetDates: function(){ return promise.then(function(arrayOfJson){ //do something with arrayOfJson }) } } }]) And then I inject it in a controller like this: App.controller('GetDatesController', ['$scope', 'BuyDatesService', function($scope, BuyDatesService){ $scope.dates = BuyDatesService.GetDates(); }]) The problem is that I get a error in that I am having undefined for dates. I think the problem is that the promise isn't resolved and the code that uses $scope.dates never gets to execute. I've looked over the documentation for $q.all but I can't find a way to make the service work properly with promises. A: You need to return the promise chain App.factory('BuyDatesService', ['$http', function($http){ var promise = $q.all([$http.get("/MyController/GetDates?Country=GB"), $http.get("/MyController/GetDates?Country=FR")]); return { GetDates: function(){ return promise.then(function(arrayOfJson){ //do something with

Q: Android service asking for permission on load I have created a simple service, that was working fine. After I changed a service, that interacts with content provider, calling startManagingContentResolver() I get exception (in LogCat). The exception means that service is asking for permission on load, without asking user. what can I do, to have service doing what it should? According to what I found, asking for permissions on load is not right. Question Is it good, to have service calling startManagingContentResolver() A: If you have permission issues, it would be much better to log the error and report it to the developer, but for an app that works fine the default behaviour should be that you should just be able to ignore any permissions error your own. A: Short answer: It is best practice to not ask user for permissions on load in Android. Long answer Permissions shouldn't be asked for on start of the service. It will only be asked once the first time the app is run by the user. If this was a bad solution, Android would not allow an app to run. A: The only reason that I would ask for permission on load is if the content provider is going to be used very infrequently, in which case it would be good for the permission to be asked only on the first use. This way, if the developer forgot to ask for the permissions before, it won't matter as much. It's better to request a permission on first use, than asking for a permission on every request on start up, since the first request won't necessarily be the request that starts the system up and depending on how often that request can be canceled, it may not matter if the app asked for permission for each request.
