The new trade association, called the Digital Advertising Alliance, hopes to lead the way on how industry groups should regulate consumers' web experiences online. Its creation, announced Tuesday, follows years of lobbying by tech companies like Facebook and Google, which have made huge amounts of money by selling advertising to web-based companies. AD AD With the new trade group, the companies argue they are able to take decisive action on the issue of protecting consumers from misleading or false advertising. The groups, which includes Coca-Cola, Johnson & Johnson, Mars and Kraft, also hope the trade group can help foster more consumer-friendly, meaningful regulation and public disclosure of the technology used to measure and influence web traffic and its impact on consumers. "For many of us who have been in this industry for a long time, it's not a new issue, but it is one of finding the right mix of incentives, to protect our consumers," said Stephen Baker, president of the Digital Advertising Alliance. The trade group will work with the companies that make the major online advertising tech — such as the Google-owned DoubleClick and the controversial Microsoft-owned ad tech company measurement firm Atlas — to chart ways to protect consumers online. It will also try to inspire greater transparency among the companies that currently charge different online advertising industry groups like DoubleClick and Atlas for access to consumer data. AD
