The switch from a tumor-supportive to an inhibitory stroma, involving many stromal cell populations, is an important hallmark of tumor progression. Macrophages are critically involved in tissue remodeling but the extent to which their different functions influence tumor progression is only beginning to be understood. Here we discuss the role of different subsets of macrophages in several tumor models and how these different states of activation can be predicted based on a comprehensive analysis of their molecular profile package org.apache.archiva.common.refinery.metadata; /* * Licensed to the Apache Software Foundation (ASF) under one * or more contributor license agreements.
