Game ready. .Q: Difference between

`Class.newInstance()` and

`Class.forName(ClassLoader.getSystemClassLoader().getResource("path")).newInstance()` I am trying to understand the difference between `Class.newInstance()` and

`Class.forName(ClassLoader.getSystemClassLoader().getResource("path")).newInstance()` if any? Also, is one more preferred over the other? A:

`Class.forName(ClassLoader.getSystemClassLoader().getResource("path")).newInstance()` is a method of `Class`. `Class.newInstance()` is a method of the `ClassLoader` API. The `ClassLoader` API is designed to be used by the Java runtime, whereas the `Class` API is designed to be used by the Java language and runtime. `Class.newInstance()` Returns a newly created object with the same class and protection domain as this object. A new instance of class `className` is created and initialized to hold the value of the new expression. The specified constructor is invoked, passing it the argument values.

`Class.forName(ClassLoader.getSystemClassLoader().getResource("path")).newInstance()`

Returns a newly created object with the same class as `className`. The specified constructor is invoked, passing it the argument values. While the `Class.newInstance()` method is the most appropriate for invoking constructors in the Java language, some constructors of the Java language and the Java runtime cannot be invoked with this method. The `ClassLoader` API is designed to allow any constructed object to refer to another object in another class loader than its own. So the `ClassLoader` API is ideal for selecting objects of other class loaders, not for constructing new objects. A: It is not possible to invoke default constructors in the Java language. So although you may be able to invoke one from `Class.forName()` (which is just a convenience method), it is not guaranteed to be the same as invoking one from `Class.newInstance()`.
