I have a set of C++ libraries that I'm using in a C# application. These libraries reside on a webserver, which I wouldn't be able to access on a build server. I'd like to compile the application on the build server using a custom linker that's set up on the build server. Is there a way to do this? EDIT: After a couple hours of research, I decided to use Visual Studio Online Build. It's an MSBuild based build environment that has templates for many projects, and there are many add-ons for it. A: You can use the MSBuild command line tools. This allows you to define build steps in a .proj file, which you can then call from the command line. You just need to take a look at the MSDN documentation for MSBuild. If you want to get even more fancy than this, this article and discussion thread describe how to use the MSBuild Task Runner to automate and queue build steps. If you don't want to be tied to the command line, you can have a program that doesn't need the command line invoke it. This might be a good starting point for you. Zelda Master Sword Mods Zelda has been one of the most influential franchises in the gaming world since her inception. While gamers across the world still love the beloved heroine, some people have grown tired of the same gameplay and visuals. Many of you might have been dreaming about a world with a new look and you would never be able to find the same in the current gaming landscape. Seeing and knowing the frustration of your fans might have driven you to bring in a new look. If you're one of those people who dreamt about the new look, then it's time for the Master Sword mods, which will change the way you think and see the franchise. Zelda Master Sword Mods Zelda sword mods are what a game fan would dream about. Many of you are probably familiar with the name Ocarina of Time and the use of the Master Sword in the game. Many of you might have wondered how the Master Sword would work, and how would the sword be 3e33713323
