1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a wiper motor, particularly for motor vehicles, having a housing, a stator with at least one armature winding and a core of a magnetic material.
2. Description of the Related Art In a conventional wiper motor of this type (e.g., from German Utility Model No. DE-GM 7,626,177.7) the housing has a first and a second bracket which each consist of a leaf spring which embraces the stator in such a way that a small gap between the leaf springs and the stator is formed. The first and second brackets are each fastened on a cylindrical support bush so that the gap is formed between the cylindrical support bush and the stator. The brackets and the cylindrical support bush form a support for the stator, so that a relative movement is effectively prevented between the support bush and the stator. This relative movement can occur as a result of temperature fluctuations, or due to the stator and the support bush having different thermal expansion coefficients and during assembly. When a motor is used in motor vehicles, the stator is exposed to high heat. The stator which is constructed as a monolithic unit is therefore to be constructed as a low-cost unit. This implies that it is to be constructed of a magnetic material, and its weight is to be as small as possible. Since a high cooling capacity is therefore required, the thermal expansion coefficient of the magnetic material of the stator is to be selected as small as possible. If
