On August 8, 1963, the federal government published a reform proposal for the American school system that called for funding of basic needs including buildings and teachers. To accomplish this, the reforms had four major steps. First, they would discontinue financial aid to schools that failed to meet minimum adequacy criteria. Secondly, all schools had to be accredited as deemed by the Council of Education. Third, funding of public schools would be redistributed away from local communities to state governments. And fourth, business would be permitted to donate money for school use in addition to taxes and contributions from local communities. The federal government provided schools with a grant of $5 billion for the first year, but this only covered about one quarter of the funding needed for each school district. According to National Geographic, it would cost at least $12 billion per year to return schools to a state of adequacy in the United States. Opponents of desegregation argued that the implementation of these changes would destroy the teacher-student-family unit of American schools by eliminating small learning environments, which were proven to lead to higher levels of learning. They also argued that the new proposals would lead to increased class sizes, not only for students, but for staff too. The enactment of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 introduced a greater emphasis on curriculum standards and testing. The federal government would also now oversee the program. Reform efforts halted
