REUTERS/Kim Hong-Ji SEOUL (Reuters) - North Korea has quietly been sending out more troops to its frontline units near the border with South Korea, a South Korean lawmaker said on Friday, giving the communist country a head start as it prepares for another nuclear test. North Korean leader Kim Jong Un supervised a military drill on Wednesday to intimidate South Korea by repeating his threat to launch a pre-emptive nuclear strike against the country, Seoul's defense ministry said. Pyongyang appears to have told South Korean residents to prepare for a large-scale military exercise in the North in early October, according to Yonhap News, which cited a military source on Friday. Yonhap also reported that hundreds of North Korean troops had been deployed near the border. The latest moves suggest North Korea could carry out a sixth nuclear test or other provocative move at any time, said Lee Cheol-woo, a lawmaker from the main opposition Liberty Korea Party. "North Korea is daring to make provocation to let the South Korea and
