More particularly, this invention relates to a method and apparatus for drying the web between two elongated fiberglass filters during the manufacture of a fiberglass product. A known method for manufacturing glass fiber products comprises passing molten fibers through a bushing or headbox to form a horizontal flowing web. The horizontal flowing web of fibers is then moved through a fluid bed of a first fluid, such as air, and then through a second fluid such as a drying agent, such as hot air, to impart surface-softening properties to the fiber product. One such glass fiber product is a fiberglass insulation. Another known method for manufacturing a fiberglass product comprises substantially reducing the size of a relatively narrow web of fibers and depositing the reduced-sized fibers in a mesh-like form on a moving collector. The collector can be an endless conveyor and the fibers can be formed into an insulative product by applying a binding binder to the collector as it moves through a drying tunnel. The first method for manufacturing a fiberglass product produces an insulative product where the fibers tend to clump together due to the surface-softening effect of the fluid in the fluid bed. Clumping of the fibers during the subsequent drying process tends to form pockets or voids in the insulative product. During the subsequent curing process the pockets become filled with resin and the insulative product acquires the desired properties for insulative products. However, the first method is relatively low output because the amount of air in the first fluid is limited to avoid excessive evaporation of the fluid. In the case of a fluid such as air, only a limited amount of the air is used to produce a fiberglass product because the remaining air is vented or exhausted. The second method for manufacturing a fiberglass product produces a continuous glass fiber product in a mat form without forming any voids. The continuous product is formed in the mesh-like form and the product can be cured by applying heat to the product, or by other methods known in the art. The glass
