That is, either: A) There is not a difference between the real and virtual voices in the feed they're displaying. B) The difference is somehow - and only sometimes, and maybe with things that don't matter (such as the infrequency and high- and low-pass cutoff frequency for filters) - beyond what the DSPs can render. C) There is a difference, but it's something having to do with the interpreting, not the rendering. For example, I can't think of any way to tell that a DAW would be displaying the engineer as using a virtual voice, other than the fact that it would use a virtual (and often much higher Q) audio mixer and those would have to be modeled within the software. (JsonValue.class) ) and public class JsonValue implements Serializable { private final static long serialVersionUID = 1L; //use toString() etc } I have seen few questions in stackoverflow related to this problem but the solutions given there did not help. In my case, I am using Serilization directly with JsonObjectBuilder, not the wrapped library like jackson-module-kotlin. A: Finally, after much trial and error, I was able to find a solution. The JsonObject has getters and setters only. When I used getString() instead of getJsonObject(string) and setString(string, JsonValue), it worked. Now I am getting the JsonValue itself and the values of the JsonObject are in it. I am using Jackson and Kotlin for this purpose. Q: UIImageView is currently delivering a preview of itself instead of an image Problem: I have a split view controller with two view controllers. In the second view controller (SettingsViewController) I have an image and a UIImageView (MainView). I have set the imageview to a file called "DetailBackground.png" in the project folder. When I load the app in my iPhone (6), the image is shown instead of the preview. If I change the image in my second view controller (SettingsViewController) and save it and set it again, it starts showing the preview again. c6a93da74d
